Well Worth The ReadBy J. RobinsonAngell and Lesperance lay out their task in the first few pages. "Our aim, as realists, is not to ring alarm bells or to preach doom and gloom, rather to lay out the bald facts, exactly as they are. We provide those with the will to control their own future the information they need to choose wisely, and to ensure that their financial destiny is in no one's hands but their own." In fact, they provide the information to choose wisely, extremely well. Angell is professor emeritus at the LSE in London, Lesperance is an attorney in Canada working with international clients seeking more "user friendly" tax regimes. Together, they are the best placed authors on to understand the economic ins and outs of statehood and what needs to be done to preserve wealth. At the same time, they make the argument that nation states have, until now, believed that taxing the very rich is a step towards redistribution of wealth, a philosophy which, these authors argue, has any number of negative consequences. How the 1% matter subtitle should really be, how the world works today and why we are, essentially, up the creek without a paddle. Well worth the read.

A manifesto for protecting your net worth from greedy governments and rapacious taxation. Flight of the Golden Geese highlights the growing importance of passport portfolio management as a form of wealth protection. There is no denying the facts: The ultra wealthy are packing up their seven-figure tax burdens and fleeing their home countries in droves for Ireland, Singapore, and other tax havens-and why shouldn't they? For years governments have relied too heavily on a small percentage of citizens to shoulder the lion's share of their greedy habit, but now these high net-worth individuals, the Golden Geese as they have come to be known, are taking matters into their own hands. No longer resigned to sit back and watch as their fortunes are sucked dry to feed the cycle of overspending, they are taking flight. However, it is not only the unbearably high taxation they leave behind. They are leaving millions of bewildered citizens, the 99%, to carry a weight that will surely crush them.
