The problem I had with the book was I seemed to fit into multiple categories and it was difficult to peg where which type I was. The concept made sense and perhaps I'm an anomaly and most fall into one distinct category. I believe most of the book is based on observation vs. science which could be just as valid if one is looking for patterns. I felt that the book explained the different types of stimuli which motivates different types of people but I didn't feel there was really any concrete advice for action one could take to become more motivated. My take away was more about how different motivational types thrive in certain environments or are stifled in other environments. I did recognize myself in several of the personality types described. I just feel it would have been more constructive if specific examples were given on how those personality types could be better motivated and ways to avoid situations that discourage or don't motivate us.0 of 0 people found the following review helpful.
